"THE HEART OF A WOMAN"

The mystery surrounding two murders in a taxi-cab (tunish Baroness Orey, the material for a charming mystery story and it is one which is well told in "The Heart of a Woman."

"The Heart of a Woman" is a book written for amusement only. It has no moral nor especial thought to convey. The author has mixed love and crime together. The heroine of her story is a very common place young society woman of England. She is in love with the heir-presumptive of an English nobleman, and he too is in love with her. Things are running along smoothly, when a stranger puts in an appearance and claims to be the heir. This stranger takes the place of the hero in his uncle's family and the former favorite is banished. This stranger finally meets death in a taxi-cab and the mystery surrounding his death involves the hero and he is facing death at the hands of the law, with admission that he killed the man, but the heroine refuses to believe him, her heart tells her that he is not guilty and although he is very much down in the mouth and resigned to his fate, she continues the fight for him and of course all comes out well in the end.

Baroness Orey is master of the art of covering up a mystery. She conceals from the reader till the very last the facts which will clear up the mystery, and they are hidden from the reader until it is time for the unfolding. The author also has a peculiar style. Her chapters are not long drawn out, but are short and the reader is getting new action in every one of them. "The Heart of a Woman" is a very interesting story, told about a very common love affair.—Published by the George H. Doran Co. New York, price $1.20 net.

"THE YELLOW LETTER"

There are several fresh new ideas developed in "The Yellow Letter," a detective story written by William Johnston of the New York World. Writers of detective stories are constantly on the alert for something new in the way of crime, something new in the way of theory and Johnston has found it in his story of "The Yellow Letter."

An epidemic of suicides throughout New York following the appearance of a yellow letter, the letter in question always being mutilated in such manner that it was impossible for the police to gain a clue of any sort.

finds that the woman is in trouble, through the attempted suicide of her sister. The mysterious yellow letter first puts in an appearance and he takes an active interest in the mystery. He interests a young friend, a post office inspector, and these two endeavor to solve the mystery which is increased from time to time, as more suicides develop.

The story is well told and while it is written with the idea of being sensational, it is merely a melodramatic romance and it has speed from beginning to end, in fact there is not a dull chapter in the book, and the reader marvels at the manifestations of the crime and the pursuit of the criminal, with the sensations unfolded when the end has been reached. The book can best be described as a sensational mystery story, well told.—Published by Bobb-Merrill Co., Indianapolis, Price $1.25, net.
